Resources for Providers

Talking to Students about Sexual Assault

Given the national conversation, youth around the nation have heard a lot in the media about sexual assault lately. Conversations about sexual assault should be a part of the safety conversations you're already having, like knowing when to speak up, how to take care of friends, and listening to your gut. The key is to start these conversations when kids are young, and have these conversations often. Teach young children the language they need to talk about their bodies and information about boundaries to help them understand what is allowed and what is inappropriate. These lessons help them know when something isn't right and give them the power to speak up. To read more, click here.
